Regulating Religion E-Journal - Call for Graduate Students Papers

The Religion and Diversity Project has launched an online graduate student E-Journal entitled Regulating Religion. The aim of this platform is to collect and make accessible innovative, well-written and well-researched graduate students papers on topics broadly related to the regulation of religion. To access and read previous issues of the E-Journal please visit the E-Journal webpage: http://religionanddiversity.ca en/projects-and-results/e-journal/.

Please find the submission details below.

Submission Information

- Papers are accepted on an ongoing basis.
- To be considered for inclusion in the E-Journal, a graduate student's paper must first be recommended by a professor/lecturer. Please note that only papers that have been recommended by professors/lecturers will be considered and reviewed.
- Professors/lecturers can recommend a paper by email to Amélie Barras at: ejournal@religionanddiversity.ca.
- Graduate students must be informed that their paper has been recommended for inclusion in Regulating Religion.
- Papers can be submitted either by professors or directly by graduate students to Amélie Barras at: ejournal@religionanddiversity.ca.
- Submitted papers should not have been previously published nor be under consideration for publication elsewhere.
- French or English papers are welcome.

Note: Once papers are submitted, graduate students will be contacted and provided further instructions related to the review process, article formatting, editing, etc. If a paper is selected for inclusion, the Religion and Diversity Project will also seek approval from the student prior to publishing.

Should you have any questions regarding the new Regulating Religion E-Journal or the submission process, please contact Amélie Barras at ejournal@religionanddiversity.ca.